Pulling, Pushing and Positive Emotions
Buddhism teaches that the root cause of all suffering is the human tendency to beople, places or things, and be averse or push away from others. We can use with this tendency and reduce the amount of time we spend in uncomfortable m	mindfulness to work
Try the following exercise:
Pulling At the end of this day take note of a time when you found yourself "clinging" to a Example; "I must get this job done before the weekend.", "I have got to conving agree with my plans for the weekend.", "I really want that new car!"). How did the mood?	ce my partner to
Pushing At the end of this day take note of a time when you found yourself avoiding, or scertain situation. (Example; "She really bugs me!", "I have got to get out of this jony clothes!"). How did this aversion affect your mood?	0.5
Positive Emotion Now take a few minutes to first center yourself with some mindful breathing. No bushing and pulling thoughts with more neutral statements. (example; "I can look when I get home and appreciate the items I like." "I can come to some agreement we both enjoy the weekend.")	k through my closet
With practice this exercise will help neutralize the tendency to push and pull, an a more neutral or positive mood state more often. Over time this will become a will literally change the neuropathways in your brain. We wish you twenty minutes of mindfulness every day!
